Celebrate National Undergraduate Research Week: April 11

Teach students resilience

- For many students, the inevitable setbacks in the research/creative process will be the first time that they have tried something and had it fail. Strategies to keep students motivated include:
 - When setbacks are part of the normal research process:
 - Explain that technical hurdles, disproven hypotheses, and dead ends are a normal part of doing research in your field. Emphasize what we have learned by the setback and how it can inform future work.
 - Model for students how you manage setbacks.
 - When setbacks are due to student error:
 - Walk through the process with the student to identify where the error was made. Keep a forward-looking attitude that emphasizes how the student can do it differently the next time.
 - Utilize other undergraduates or graduate students who have recently learned similar skills to work with the student to teach needed skills or explain how they overcame similar challenges.
 - Review your communication plan with your student to see if misunderstandings could be caught sooner.
 - Be sure to acknowledge what students are doing well so they feel motivated to keep trying.

Incorporate routine checks for understanding

- Don't assume that a lack of questions means that the student understands. Be proactive about catching areas of misunderstanding early to prevent larger problems later on. Try these strategies:
 - Have your student write out a procedure or research plan before they carry out the experiment or research. Review the plan with them and review any areas that seem less certain.
 - Ask your students to send you a weekly email update with 1. a summary of what they learned that week; 2. any obstacles they encountered; 3. what they are planning for next week.
 - Have your student explain their research (either in writing or in person) to someone outside of your field. Check for areas where understanding is not very deep.

MDC Workshop: Design for Non-Designers

Thursday, May 9; 9:00am to 4:00pm

Memorial Union, Stouffer Lounge

Great design is a critically important component of your marketing efforts – it creates meaningful first impressions, differentiates your organization from competitors, boosts awareness, and is a great way to connect with customers. The MDC's brand-new workshop Design for Non-Designers will explore the elements and principles of design and how you can use it to make your company more appealing to potential customers.

In Design for Non-Designers, participants will learn why design is important for effective marketing, review great (and bad) logos, and much more. A few of the topics covered include using color effectively, communicating with type, tips on designing common marketing pieces, and when to hire a professional or design on your own.

You don't have to be wildly creative to make effective designs!
